A Reminder to Trade Association Members: "No-Poaching" Codes of Ethics Can Cause Antitrust Problems

posted on: Thursday, August 28, 2014

Trade associations are a collection of competitors and, as such, can raise potential antitrust risks. In particular, an association's code of ethics might effectively be an agreement between members not to compete among themselves. Recent Federal Trade Commission (FTC) enforcement actions serve as reminders to associations and their members that antitrust authorities take seriously any such antitrust violations.

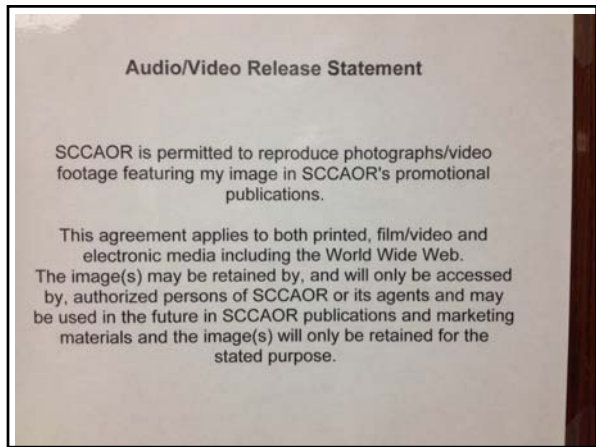

On August 22, 2014, the FTC accepted for public comment separate consent orders with the National Association of Residential Property Managers (NARPM) and the National Association of Teachers of Singing (NATS). Each association supports its thousands of members and their customers in numerous legitimate ways. Unfortunately, each association also had a code of ethics that contained provisions the FTC considered agreements not to compete. NARPM's code made it unethical for a property manager to "knowingly solicit competitor's clients." NATS's offending provision read,

Trade assoc. should have a measure of antitrust avoidance.

The consent decree offers key guidance on antitrust compliance for trade associations and their members. The decree makes clear that the FTC expects trade associations to adopt clear antitrust compliance measures and to enforce them rigorously. The decree required an appointment of antitrust legal counsel for NAMM, annual antitrust training for the board of directors and staff, the presence of antitrust counsel at all association events and meetings, and the review and approval of agendas and materials prior to distribution at meetings.
