

Section 7

Public Health

Public health consists of the range of activities and issues that affect the health of a community. Under this broad rubric fall many issues, including aging, asthma, immunizations, cultural competency, organ donation, communicable diseases, and public hygiene. Public health research examines how communities can adapt and respond to issues detrimental to the health of its individuals. Family physicians are on the front lines of public health—often serving in many communities as both family doctor and public health official—making their advice crucial as states formulate public health policy.

This section contains several subsections breaking out a few of the more prominent areas of public health legislation. The aforementioned issues fall into public health (general), followed by sections detailing legislation on disaster preparedness, environmental health, healthy schools, HIV/AIDS, obesity and smoking and tobacco.

AAFP policies on public health issues are available on the AAFP web site.
